2. The Peace Preservation Corps units listed above are all composed of Mongols, with the exception of those in the Ordos Left Flank Center and Ordos Right Flank Forward Banners, which are composed of about half Mongol and half Chinese troops

Once in a great while, the Chahar Provincial Government has given the units in Chahar and Silingol Leagues from 20 to 30 rounds of ammunition per man; the Suiyuan Provincial Government has occasionally done the same for the units in Ulanjap and Yehejo Leagues, but in both cases, delivery usually has not been made even four or five months after the ammunition was committed.

3. The troops in the four leagues all have rifles, mostly 79mm and 65mm (type 38) pieces, and there are a few light machine guns, but the equipment is old and the ammunition is limited to about 80 rounds per man. If, in moving to the Alashan area, these troops are forced to engage in one or two battles, they will probably use up their ammunition. It is possible that some units will encounter Uljiwachir (Wulji Ochar) and his Chinese Communist-controlled troops, who number only about 500 and whose supply of ammunition is low. Because the PPC units have not been unified, but left to fight as small individual units without a constant source of supply, their record against Uljiwachir has not been good.
